INCOMPAS Commends White House on Gail Slater Hire

WASHINGTON, D.C. (February 16, 2018) – The White House has announced that policy expert Gail Slater will be joining the White House National Economic Council.

In response, Chip Pickering, CEO of INCOMPAS, the internet and competitive network association, praised the move and released the following statement:

“We want to congratulate Gail Slater on her new role at the White House, and commend the Administration on a fantastic choice. Gail is a rare policy talent, who combines deep substantive expertise with grace and charm that often unites people with differing points of view.

“Every poll shows main street business, Republicans and Trump voters overwhelmingly support strong net neutrality policies that keep the internet open, innovative and affordable. Gail’s expertise on broadband deployment and open internet policy will be a valuable asset to the White House, and the President who understands the power of competition and using internet services like Twitter to communicate with the American people.”
